Customer Reviews

So to give a polite summary of what happened below, I'll keep it simple: The author is from SoCal. The reviews that all happened to show up in a ridiculously short span of time for a total NICHE item (cmon, a popsicle book just isn't going to be a top seller) also happened to have a few things in common: *Nearly all were the only review of the people. *None were Verified Purchases. (Mine wasn't, either--I checked it out at the library--but I don't write like I'm marketing it either.) *Nearly all openly list their location as Southern Cali; one who defended the author fiercely in response to criticism MET the author at a SF area "Faire." *They all use direct marketing quotes FROM the book, they quote chapter summaries, and they ALL are written exactly like persuasive English 101 essays for college courses. My guess? Her students did it. My hope? They love her. My fear? She asked them to. My 99% certainty? They haven't made a darn THING in this book...So my own assessment is this: Some of it is ridiculously basic and therefore fine--pomegranate apple, for instance... a couple kinds of juice tossed in Tovolo molds and voila... wow, not exactly mind-blowing. MOST that are "original" or "creative" are GROSS. Green tea ones were especially wretched. Some made us want to hurl, and we use top notch ingredients. They just don't work. The reason we even checked it out was we won an also-overhyped product, this frou frou pop mold maker that "ooh aah" you freeze then shove on the counter. It's the Zoku.
