This book is a must-have in your natural living collection. I own a few Rodell books on natural living, and a Home and Gardens book specifically on green cleaning. I've dabbled in natural cleaning products and methods for about 10 years now, each year going a little deeper. All that being said, I was genuinely surprised at how much information there was in this book that I genuinely didn't know. For instance, I had no idea that the regulations on ingredient labeling in commercial cleaning products were so atrociously loose. I thought that when I looked at the ingredients on a bottle of window cleaner, I was reading all the actual ingredients, but I'm not. That is disturbing. The recipes are great, and some of them are really unexpected. I can't wait to make my own grapefruit extract. It looks so easy, and it is my favorite smell of all time in cleaning products. I also plan to start using the herbal ant repellent very soon now that spring is here. They were terrible last year, and nothing really worked. Fingers crossed on this one. The homemade disinfecting wipes are next on my list to try. I have to admit that I am a fan of disinfecting wipes from the store, and those were the last of the straight chemical cleaners for me to take out of regular rotation. Everything I've actually tried so far has worked great. What I have tried is the lemon dishwasher gel. (I had the ingredients on hand.) I LOVE it. It has worked fine so far, it smells good, and it only takes a little bit. What I really have to rave about though, is the heavy duty glass cleaner. I've tried natural glass cleaners before, and they just didn't do it for me. They always left streaks.
