There is no end of lore about the power of drinking the juice of vegetables and fruits. This book contains a wealth of recipes that are organized by ailment and which juice is supposed to aid which condition. Naturally, no book of recipes is a substitute for seeing your physician, but adding veggie juices can help you get vitamins, enzymes, micronutrients (the je ne sais quoi pas of nutrition) and they are refreshing and filling as a snack. I find I get a good burst of energy from drinking the juices in this book. This book is organized by ailment, and the juices are recipes in the back. Some ailments overlap in what juices the author recommends. So you may be making the same one for you and for your family, but for different conditions. I sometimes do a mix of carrot-celery-apple-ginger-beet-kale juice to my regime before working out. I find the mix is almost as much a "wake up" as a cup of coffee. Sometimes I add some grapefruit and delete the beet. Sometimes I add some parsley; the author warns that parsley, however, in LARGE quantities is actually toxic. I did not know that. Good info! A friend, who is mending his health from a very severe condition that requires that he live and eat as carefully as possible, is using juices as well to assist in his recovery. He's seen his bloodwork improve; whether it's just from getting back to healthy eating or adding the juice, I do not know as it's not a controlled experiment. But he's enjoying the juices and he's mindful of what he's eating; more vegetables and fruits, less fatty food and sugar. I will say, vegetable juice, made fresh, is a wonderful snack or even a light meal and kids who WILL not eat vegetables can often be coaxed to drink a juice.
